

The Curious Little Penguin

A StorySprout Press Book

In the middle of the Great White North, where the ice is thick and the wind whistles tunes, lived Pip.

Pip was a small penguin with a very big question for everything he saw.

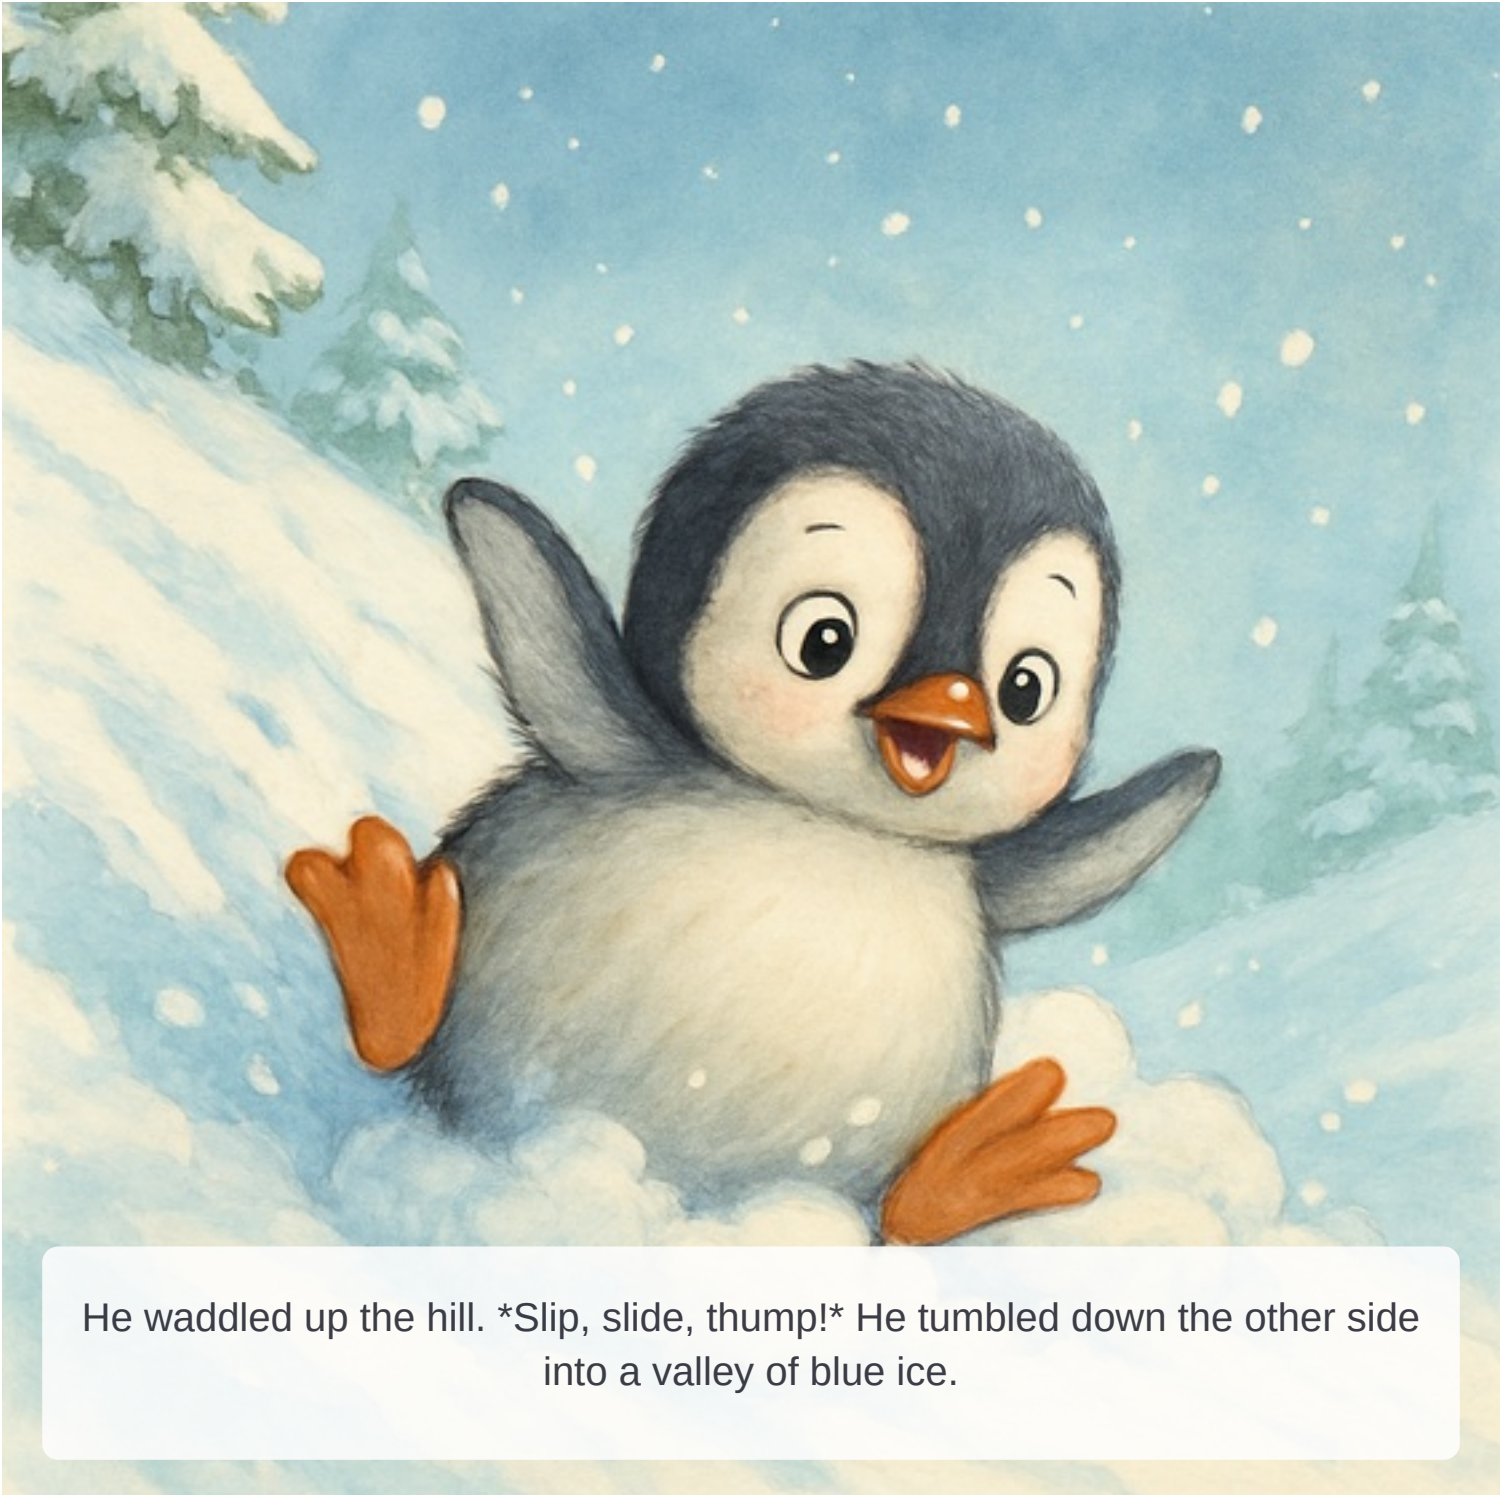

"Why is the snow white?" Pip asked. "Why is the water cold?"

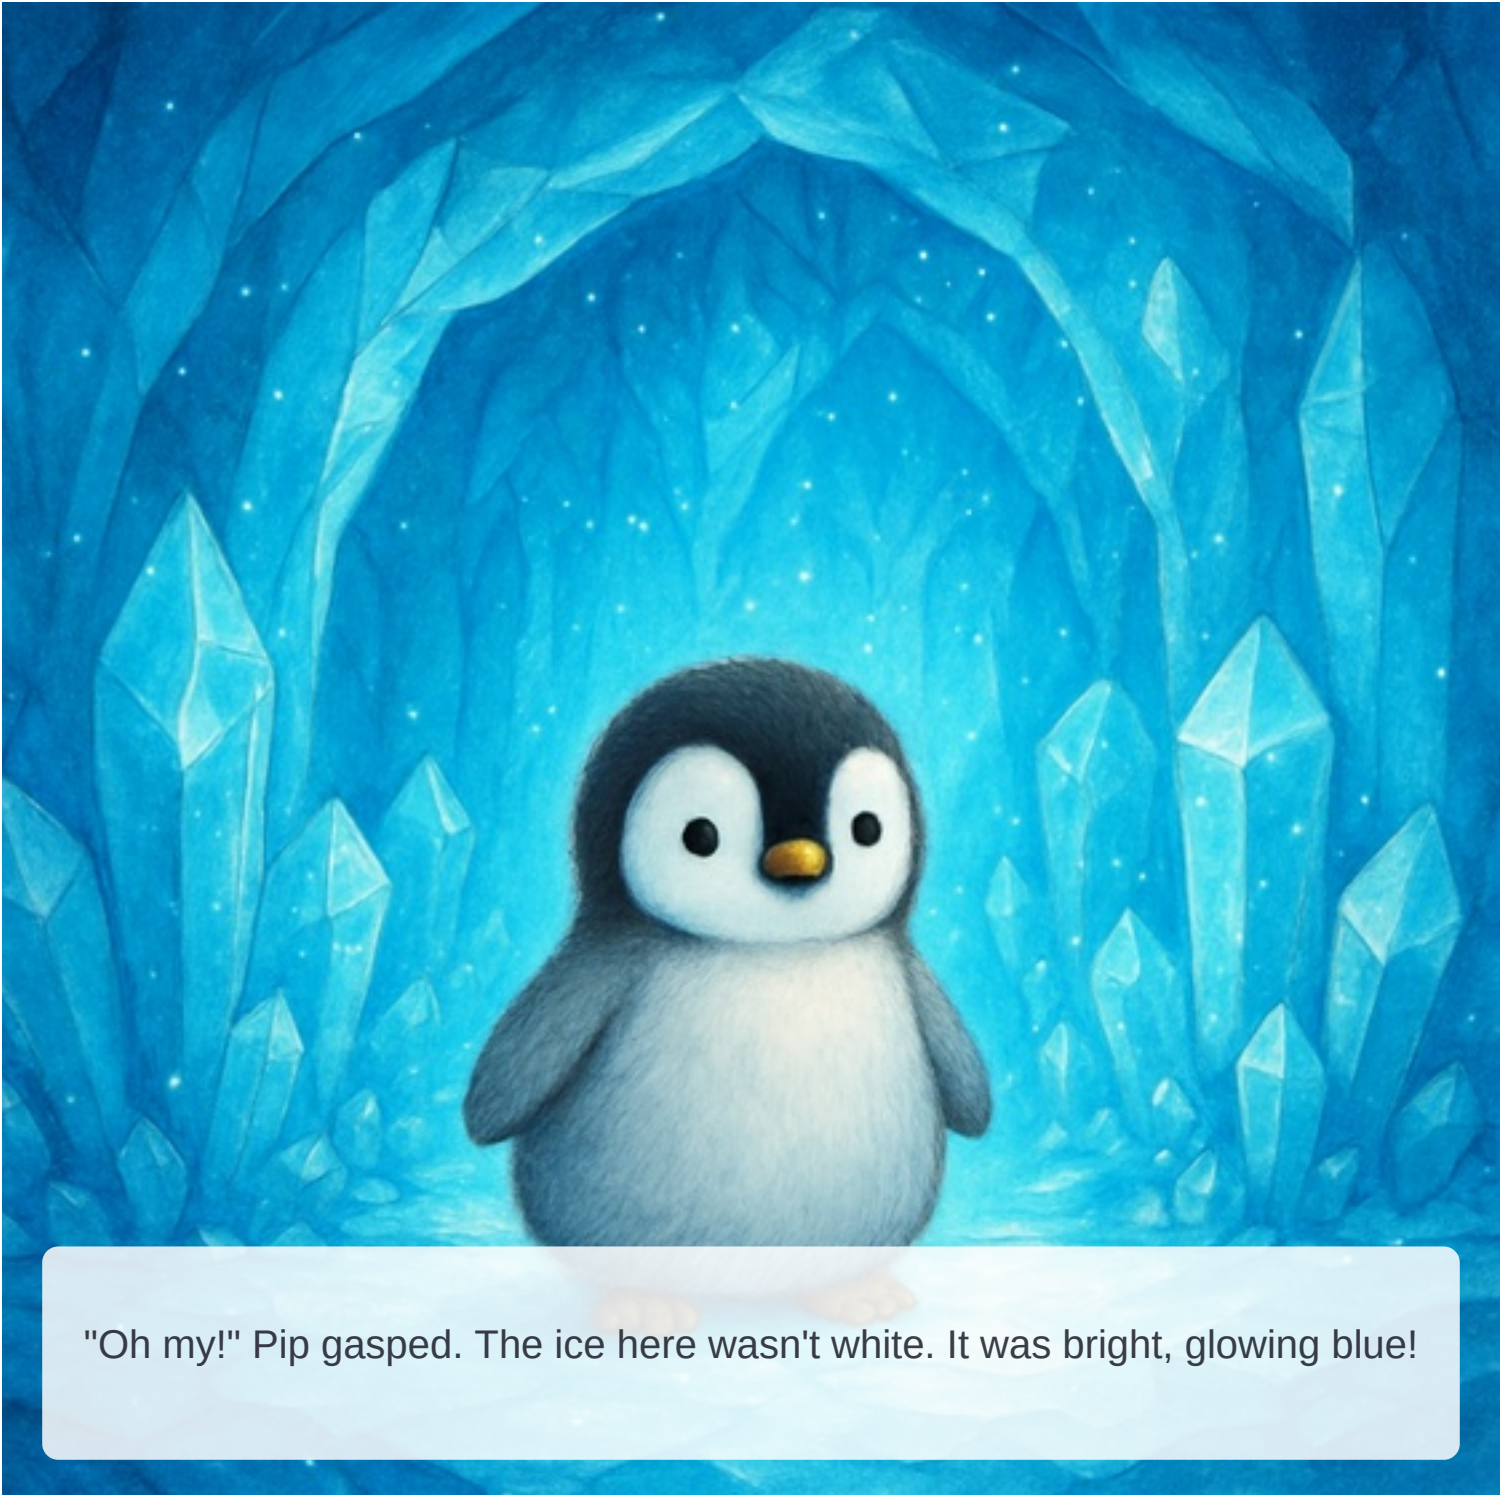

Waddles would laugh. "That's just how the world is, Pip. Stay close to the colony, it's safe here."

But Pip's curiosity was like a little engine. He wanted to see what was beyond the next snowy hill.

He waddled up the hill. Slip, slide, thump! He tumbled down the other side into a valley of blue ice.

"Oh my!" Pip gasped. The ice here wasn't white. It was bright, glowing blue!

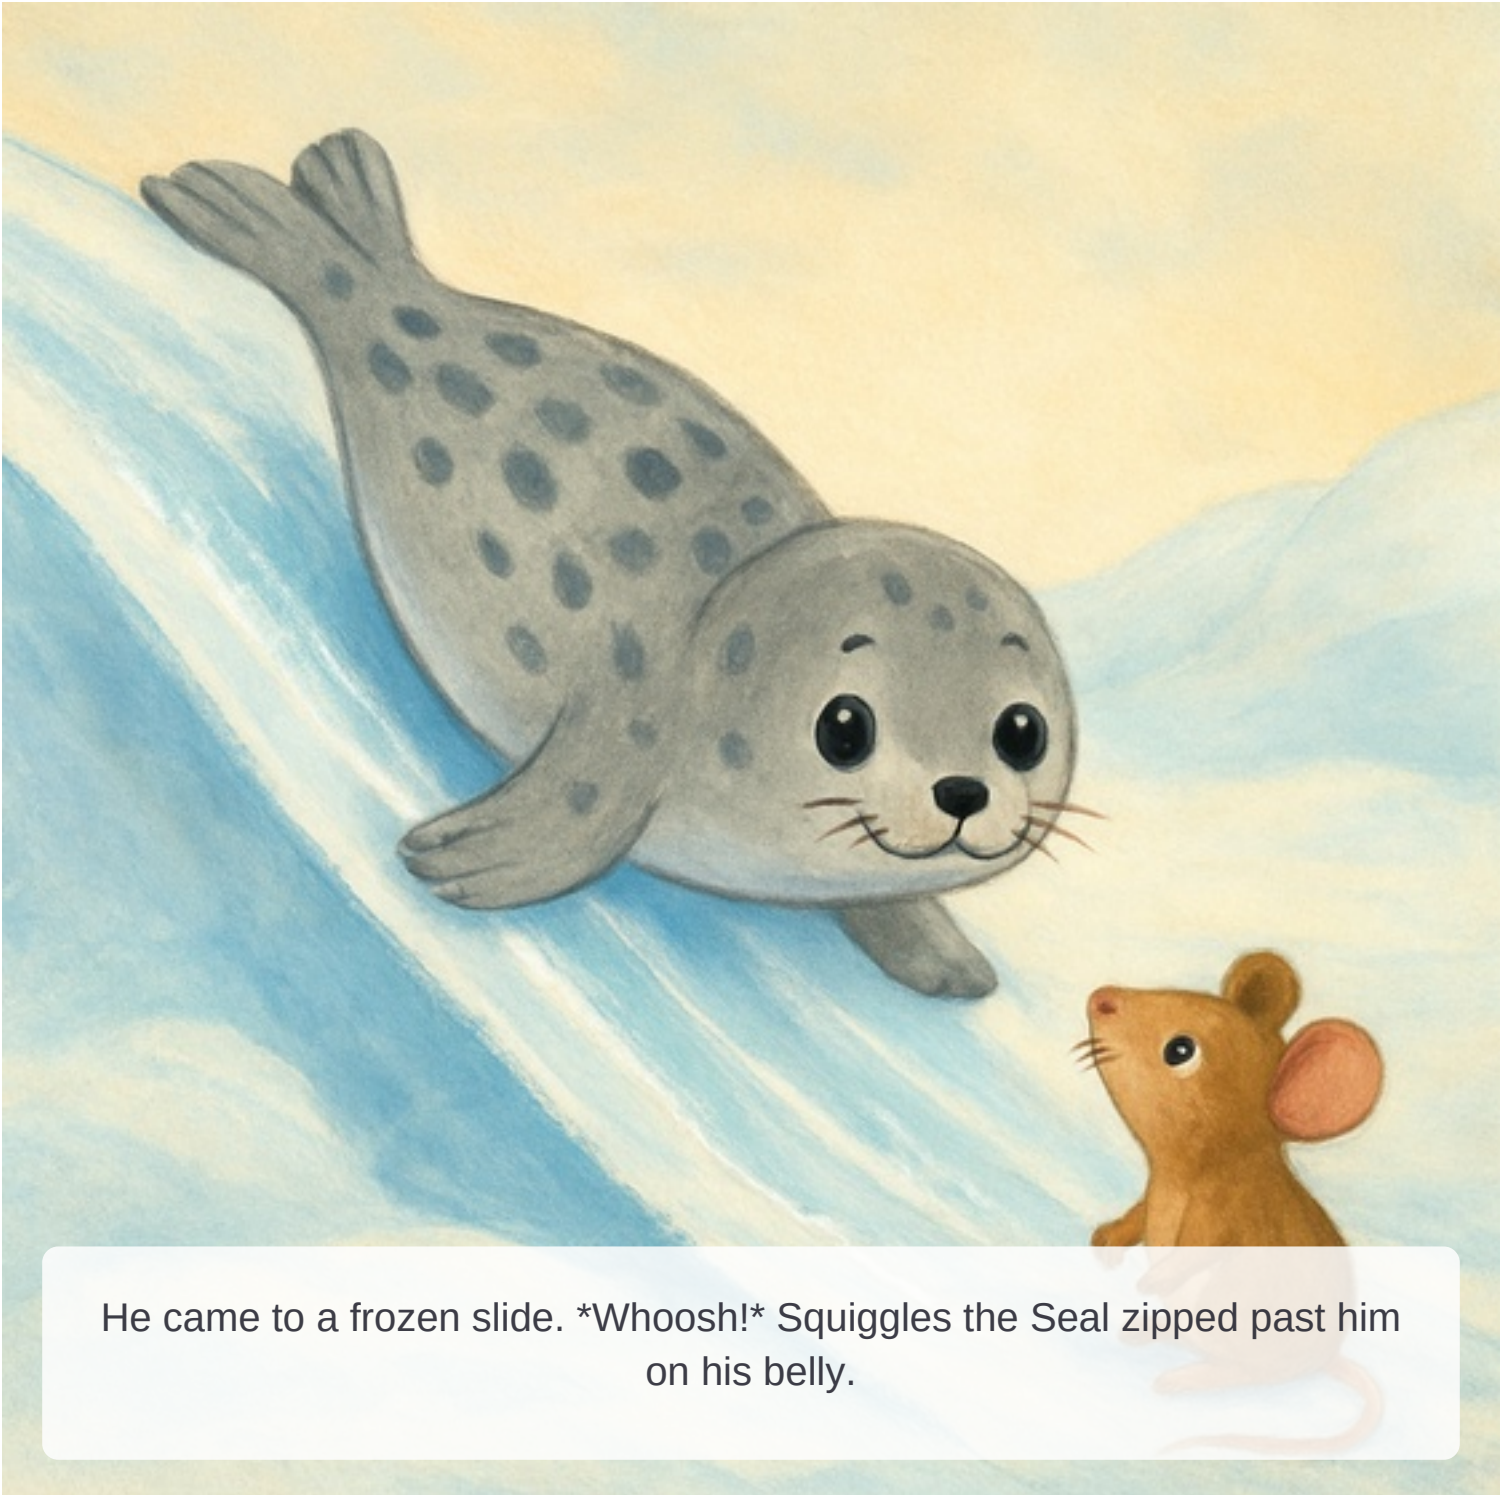

"It's blue because it's very old," said a voice. Pip looked up and saw Professor Puffin.

"Is the whole world blue?" Pip asked. "Not at all!" the Professor chirped.
"The world is as many colors as a rainbow!"

Pip was amazed. He wanted to see more colors! He thanked the Professor and waddled on.

He came to a frozen slide. Whoosh! Squiggles the Seal zipped past him on his belly.

"Want to race?" Squiggles barked. "I... I'm not supposed to go fast," Pip said. "But I am curious!"

Pip lay on his belly. One, two, three... GO!

They slid over the ice and under the frozen arches. Pip saw the silver ocean and the golden sun.

But then, the wind began to growl. A big, grey cloud covered the sun.

"A storm is coming!" Squiggles said. "I have to go back to my mama. You should too, Pip!"

Pip looked around. The snowy hill looked very different in the dark. He didn't know which way was home.

"Waddles? Mama? Papa?" Pip called out. But the wind just whistled back.

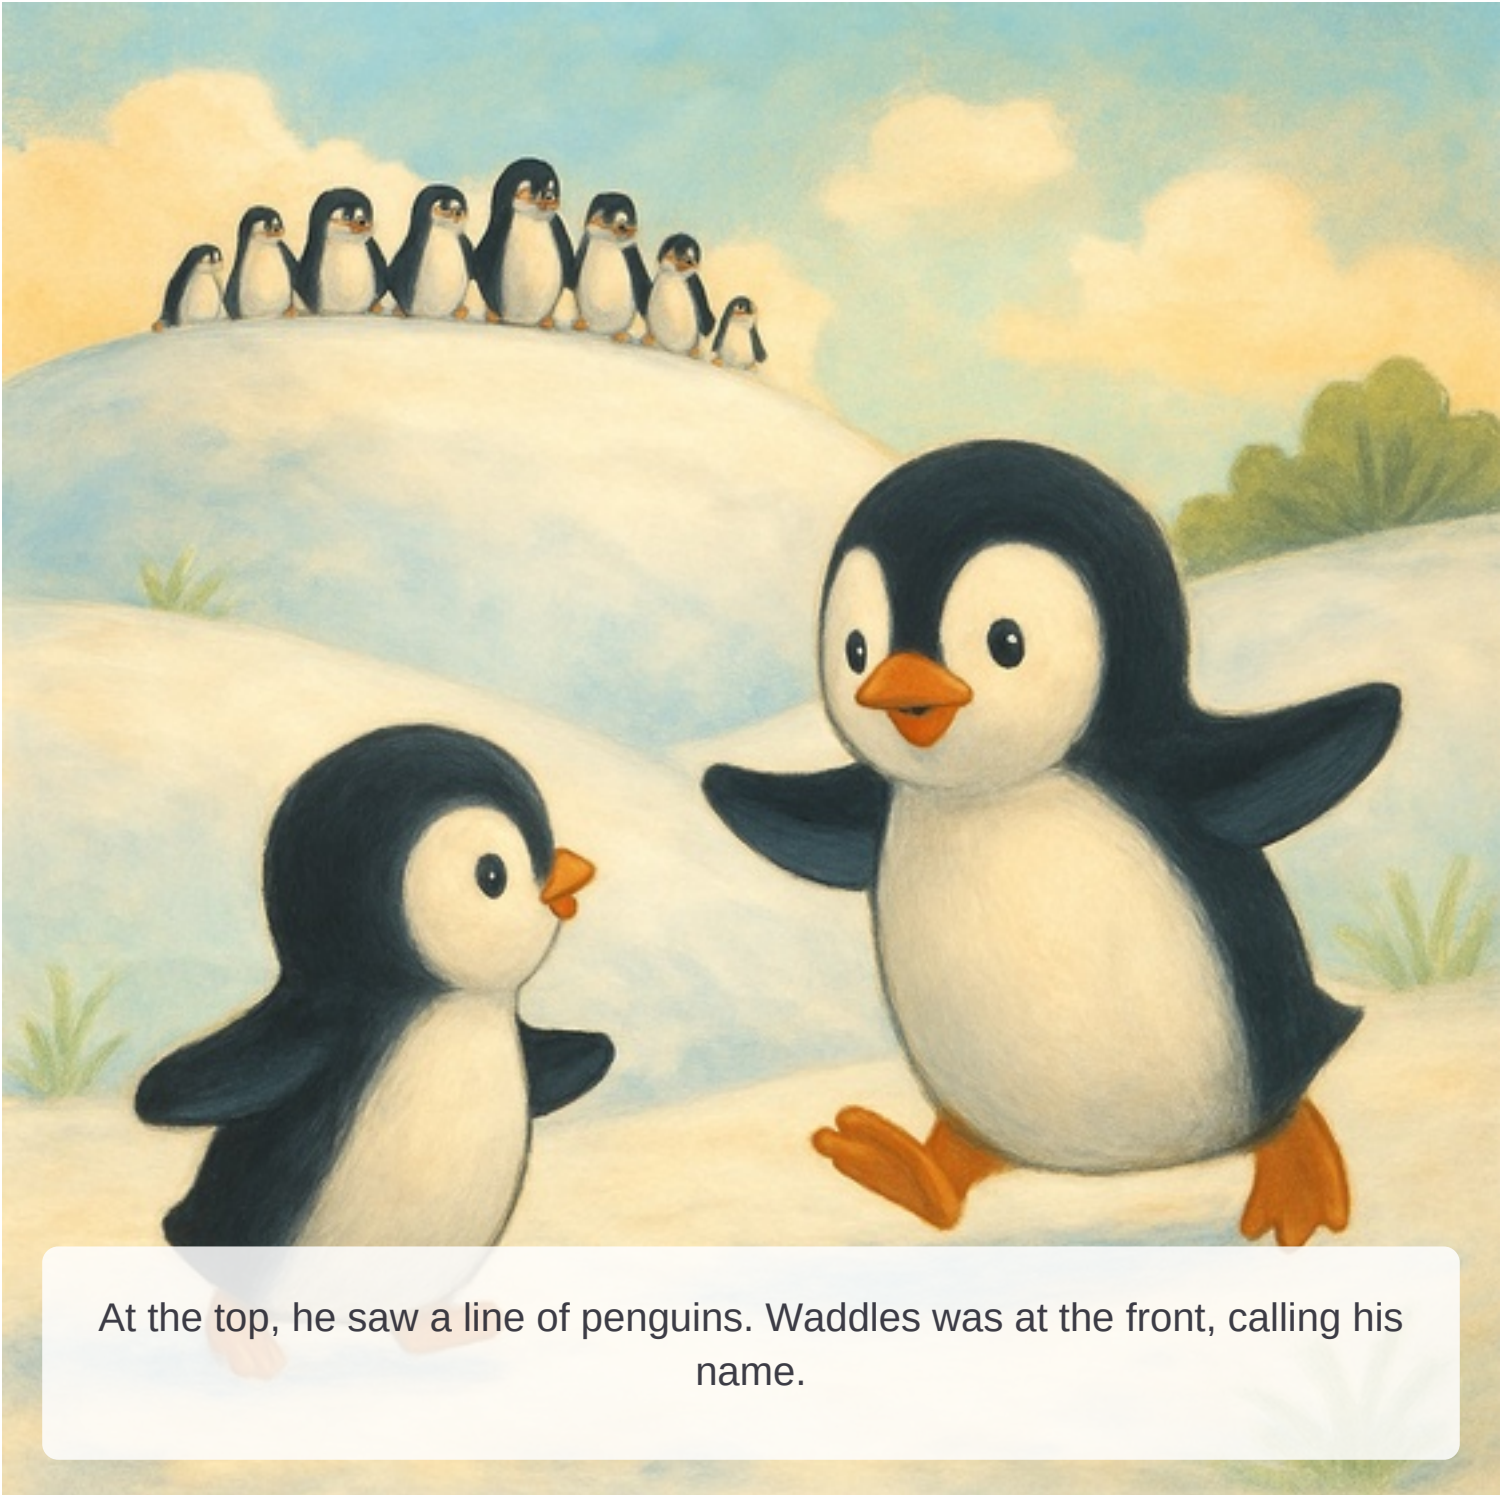

Pip remembered what Professor Puffin said. "The stars can show the way when the sun is gone."

He saw the brightest star. It was right over the hill where the colony lived!

Waddle, trip, waddle! Pip pushed through the snow. He was tired, but he kept going.

At the top, he saw a line of penguins. Waddles was at the front, calling his name.

"I found so many colors, Waddles!" Pip chirped as he was hugged. "The world is big, but I'm glad I'm home."

About the Story

Pip the penguin is full of questions about the world. When his curiosity leads him on an Antarctic adventure, he discovers amazing things - and finds his way home with a little help from the stars.
